SOUTH AFRICAN MACKEREL AT PROVINCETOWN Provincefown, Mass., Feb. 22.—The long-expected oneignment of African mackerel arrived here last Cape Town, via London, in steamers. The consistement, which consists of thirty three casks holding about three barrels each, was opened for inspection this morning at the packing sheds of the Union Fish Company on the Railroad Dock of Agent Collins, to whom they were consigned. A large crowd of fisher-men examined the fish and all unite in pronouncing then mackered fally equal to, if not better than, the Northern lish. The cargo has been many days on the way, but was in first-class order, which prefty effectually shuts up the croakers who claimed that nsh could not be cured in that climate to that they would stand the trip across the equator. The fish are about thirteen to fifteen inches long and the first are about thirteen to lifteen meless long and the field is firm and white. They are the same shape, they have the same number of fins, a little larger eyes, and differ from the American macherel only in the stripes, which comes a little lower down on the sides of the fish, something like the bullseve macherel caught on this court some years ago. They are much superfor to mackerel caught on the American coast in the early spring. They were caught in a season which, at Cape Town, corresponds with our spring.
